Moran's flailing, retro-pop cartoon characters are the lure to this fizzy but enlightening entry in the Community Helpers series. A class taking a field trip to a construction site meets mustached Mr. Moore, who expounds upon the basics. (In a nicely realistic touch, "He says we have to stay outside the fence.") Mr. Moore shows off the various machines and techniques that will help build this future school, taking special care to talk about safety measures (hard hats, vests, beeping trucks) and green energy. The text, delivered in a wacky font, offers easy-to-digest nuggets ("Some trucks work with big metal teeth"), while boxed sections explain the scene more deeply ("An excavator digs wide ditches for basements"). Zany to look at but pretty darn educational. Grades 1-3. --Daniel Kraus

Fun fictional story about a field trip to a construction site to watch their new school being built! We could look around to our classroom and find all the same details!

It's a good book for children four through six years old. Perhaps even a little older. It provides good information. My Pre-K class loved it. I didn't give it five stars because I found it to be a bit long. I read it in two sittings. Some children may not be able to sit for more than one chapter. The book is divided into chapters.

Our grandson loves construction equipment & knows the name of all of the machines

Meeting the community workers in our neighborhood and seeing what they do is a great way for my toddler class to learn in the class. Colorful, and just long enough to hold their attention.

Bought for my classroom my students will love it.

Kid Friendly!
